NSPCC Research into Social Workers Knowledge of Child Sexual Abuse

As part of the research, a series of interviews and small group discussions were conducted with social workers, managers, and LSCB chairs. The interviews and discussions considered the extent to which social workers are confident in working with cases of child sexual abuse, along with the issues and challenges of this work. The research found that social workers are facing increasing caseloads and often need to work without support, time, knowledge, training, and sometimes front line experience to identify sexual abuse. They are often more confident in dealing with intra-familial sexual abuse than cases involving internet grooming, trafficking, sexting, or peer abuse.
