Decision on Jurisdiction of Investigatory Powers Tribunal and Whether Sexual Relationships Induced by Undercover Police Officers Constituted Degrading Treatment:

The High Court has ruled that the Investigatory Powers was the exclusive jurisdiction for Human Rights Act claims against the police as a result of the activities of undercover police officers, authorised as Covert Human Intelligence Sources, where such conduct was not a breach of a fundamental right. The Tribunal did not have jurisdiction to determine proceedings brought by Claimants at common law.

Lack of diversity still a problem according to ACPO workforce lead

Association of Chief Police Officers' workforce development lead Sir Peter Fahy has suggested forces should be made to positively discriminate in order to address the lack of black and ethnic minority officers.

Service should be rewarded for continued crime reductions say ACPO

The Association of Chief Police Officers have moved to praise officers for their work in reducing the number of crimes committed annually by 10 million in the past 18 years, amid suggestions that the fall in offences may be exaggerated.

Public trust and confidence central to British policing model, says ACPO

The Association of Chief Police Officers has published an external review of policies and practices relating to integrity in the UK Police Service.

Government proposals could provide influx of foreign chiefs

Senior officers from New Zealand, Australia and America could be set to move to the UK under a proposed shake-up of British police forces.

Regulation of CCTV and other surveillance camera technology

This written ministerial statement on the regulation of CCTV and other surveillance camera technology was laid in the House of Commons on 7 February 2013 by James Brokenshire, and in the House of Lords by Lord Taylor of Holbeach. The Government favours the use of CCTV and automatic number plate recognition (ANPR) systems as a crime fighting and public protection tool. It supports the use of overt surveillance in a public place wherever its deployment is in pursuit of a legitimate aim, necessary to meet a pressing need, proportionate and compliant with any relevant legislation. Like the public, the Government expects that where CCTV is deployed it is as effective as it can be in meeting its stated purpose and has appropriate privacy safeguards. Close 21 March 2013.
